

I want to become an equity analyst in private equity or fund in Singapore after completing the MBA programme. My previous educational background and working experience in accounting and auditing build me solid accounting techniques and financial data analysis skills which are demanded that are required for an equity analyst. In the long term, after gaining enough sufficient investment experiences, I would like to manage a small fund for my family.

Commented [SC1]: Unclear; something is missing here.

To facilitate my career transition from an auditor to an equity analyst, I started the CFA and HEC MBA programme this year. Although I majored in accounting and finance, I am not competent have not yet gained the necessary knowledge in certain fields, such as economics and financial derivatives. Thus, the CFA curriculum can help me to acquire these knowledge and to enhance the finance courses in the MBA programme. Besides In addition to financial knowledges, international exposure and alumni resources, which the HEC-NUS MBA programme provides, are equally crucial for me to be a qualified analyst. International experiences enhance my business acumen and enables me to analyse issues from various perspectives.

Singapore has an excellent geographical location, as it is within a reasonable distance from great geographic location which is not distant to the several fast-growing economies, including such as China, India and Vietnam. In addition, Singapore has a well-rounded financial system, which create an ideal working environment for investors and financial institutions. NUS provides specific elective courses about Asian financial markets and businesses, such as value investing in Asia and family business and wealth management. These courses will help me to have a better understanding of the financial markets where I will invest in the future.